Painting portrays death. Figures in painting lose their life from the moment the painting freezes their life and confines them to stillness. For human beings, “life” is directly connected to movement. Even breathing is unable to be activated without movement. Movement is the way that people continue to live, and proof that they are alive. The painted figure who cannot move and feel, whose freedom is restricted by the very fact that it is still, and painted, is a metaphor for the restrictions in life that all humans have to deal with.
